

Cell Phones In School

Cell phones should be allowed in school because emergencies happen! When something comes up when we least expect it, and we need to contact someone right away, the first device that we pull out is our cell phone. Cell phones are small to easily fit into a pocket, and quickly pull out when needed. They're useful for everyone that needs to contact someone if they don't have a regular phone with them. Practically every adult owns a cell phone, and teens as well to contact their friends. Cell phones are really popular with teenagers because they like a fast way to contact their friends, but cell phones are causing a big problem in school. Students bring their cell phones to school, and sometimes uses it during class, allowing cell phones to not be allowed in school at all.

To begin, if you are in danger, you can contact the authorities or a medical provider. You never know what the future holds, therefore, you can always be prepared for what lies ahead. If you're in a car accident, witness a car accident, see someone in danger, etc., you can call for medical help immediately; by just having a cell phone, you can actually save someone's life, or your own. Accidents can happen anywhere unexpectedly, even at school. Sometimes there are students that bring dangerous weapons to school that may harm your peers, but you can do something about it! You can call the authorities, and tell the people working at the office about what you witnessed. Cell phones are the fastest way to contact someone when you need help, or someone else does.

Another reason is if you want to contact a friend about homework. You or your friend can be home sick, and you need to know what homework you are missing at school. If you are home sick, you can text your friend to see what assignments your missing while your sick. Your friend might not always remember what the homework is after your not sick anymore. It can be a lot simpler for them to text you when they receive the assignment. Although teachers don't like it when their students text in school, they can always text after the class is over. You can always ask your teacher about the assignments that you missed after you recovered from your sickness, but it would be a lot easier if you finished it at home while you were starting to recover.

Lastly, parents buy cell phones for their children due to how fast they are able to contact them. If they want to know if their kids got to school safely, they can easily call them, or text them to make sure. Parents worry about their children's safety when they aren't around to protect them, cell phones allow them to easily contact each other. Parent's can't be with their child every hour of the day, cell phones allow them to contact their children to check up on them. Cell phones aren't only for parents to contact their children, the child can contact the parents easily as well. It lessens the burden of worries knowing that your parents is alright, or your child is safe and fine.

However, there are some people that believe that cell phones shouldn't be allowed in school. Despite their beliefs about why cell phones shouldn't be allowed in school, I still strongly believe that cell phones should be allowed in school! There are students that have after school activities to attend to, and need cell phones to contact their guardian. After they are done, some kids walk home from school, while others don't. There are parents out there that aren't comfortable with their kids walking home from school, or other locations. They want their kids to immediately contact them to take them home safely from school. There are times when parents are late coming to pick up their child from school, they can easily call their child to tell them that they are going to be late coming to get them. Cell phones do have their benefits in situations that unexpectedly come up.

In conclusion, cell phones should be allowed in school. There are several benefits for students to have their cell phone on them during school. When we need to contact our parents in emergencies, we are easily able to. Cell phones are a quick, fast way to contact our parents, and their easy to carry around as well. Cell phones can be set to silent when in school, causing no disturbance to others. Anything can happen no matter where we are, including school. We can never be too prepared, having cell phones with us can really help with a lot of matters in our everyday life. Therefore, cell phones should be allowed for students to use whenever necessary in school.
